INTRODUCTION

Maritime Documents, Enrollments and Registrations

Ships are issued documents to show they are entitled to the protection of the country whose flag they are flying and are not nation-less pirates. American ships are issued Certificates of Enrollment if they are trading between United States ports or engaged in the fishing industry. They are issued Certificates of Registration if they are trading with foreign ports. The country was divided into customs districts. These documents were issued by the custom house for the district where the ship was built, in the case of Guilford, New Haven. There were two copies of each document, one carried by the ship, and one kept on file in the custom house. Around the 1920s, the custom house copies of these documents were transferred to the National Archives in Washington, D.C.

These documents include a description of the vessel; its gross tonnage, length, breadth, and depth of hold; the type of bow and stem and type of figurehead, the number of decks, the rig, and number of masts. The year of construction and place is included, and the names of owners, the ship's home port, the first captain, and sometimes the builder or master carpenter. New documents are issued when there is a change in ownership, or home port, or the vessel is altered. These documents contain much useful historic information, and there have been a number of projects to make it more accessible. The largest took place in the late 1930s under the WPA. Teams were employed to transcribe the information in the documents for a given customs district into alphabetical lists of ships, which could then be bound into volumes. In some cases, including New Haven, the transcribing was not carried beyond ships built in 1867, when the Government began publishing a list of American flag vessels. Unfortunately, the Government list contained far less information than the documents.

Note: "T" indicates gross tonnage. This is NOT a measurement of the ship's weight. It is a measurement of the total internal volume of the ship in cubic foot units originally based on a large barrel called a tun. There are other tonnage measurements, but they do not appear on pre-1867 documents. Net tonnage is the internal volume of the ship, subtracting non-income producing spaces such as crew quarters. Displacement is the actual weight of the ship in long tons, the weight of water the ship's hull displaces when afloat.

EXPLANATION AND USAGE

Three sources were used to compile the list. i) The Connecticut Ship Database, ii) Mystic Seaport's Database, and iii) the New York Ship database. The abbreviations in bold (CT, MY, and NY) correspond to these sources from which the data was obtained.

CT – The Connecticut Ship Database. The four volumes of “Ship Registers & Enrollments” provided the backbone for the list since the works contained full information. Entries are given with the following information:

VESSEL NAME, vessel type, district, customs district, where vessel was built and year. Source

This is followed by additional information, if available, such as:

Volume of the vessel in “tons,” length of vessel (in foot and inches), beam (foot and inches), draft (foot and inches), (regarding the rig:) number of decks, masts, type of stern and figurehead. By whom vessel was built. Registration, enrollment, hailing port(s), names of owners and masters, re-admeasurements and surrender.

Entries not found in the “Ship Registers & Enrollments” were obtained from the following two sources:

MY – Mystic Seaport Museum's online Database “Connecticut Ship Database, 1789-1939”

Information includes: Vessel name, type, district, where and when built.

“Tonnage,” measurements, rigging, date of registration, surrender.

NY – New York Ship database of vessels registered or enrolled in the port of New York 1784-1862

Information includes: Vessel name, type, “tonnage,” date, customs district.
